Technology industry opportunity at a glance

The information, communication and technology workforce in Australia numbers around 628,000.

Research from Deloitte and the Australian Computer Society indicates that new waves of technological developments are fuelling Australia's growing digital economy. The contribution of digital technologies to the economy is forecast to grow from $79 billion in 2014 to $139 billion in 2020 - growth of over 75%.

A tailored solution for the technology sector

The Australian technology sector has contributed to many high profile success stories, from Google Maps and Wi-Fi, to the black box flight recorder. The sector includes multinational players, a vibrant start up scene and everything in between.

Australian technology companies, such as Atlassian, have forged a global name and the local workforce has become highly skilled and experienced. The Australian market features a tech-savvy consumer base who are quick to adopt digital technologies, and this will only continue as the digital economy continues its upward trajectory.

Amid the global boom in tech services, Australians are regularly traveling to international hubs such as Bangalore in India or Silicon Valley in the United States. Being an employer in the technology sector comes with its own set of unique risks when protecting employees.

Chubb has reviewed and enhanced its policy wording to help technology businesses protect themselves and their employees against the most common and emerging risks they may face.

In addition to the comprehensive accident, injury, medical and disability benefits provided by Chubb, we have crafted a personal accident and business travel wording to address the specific needs of the technology industry, including the following benefits.

Duty of care and risk management

With an ever increasing mobile workforce, employers are having to assume greater ownership for the well-being of their employees. Employees expect potential threats to have been identified and any risks minimised.
